The excitatory colliculus lateralis was identified in three adult cats using the transvesical method. They were formed by small nuclei near the anteroventral pole of the colliculus medialis. In every preparation, they could be demonstrated in one or two retrogradely labeled nuclei in the pons. The colliculus lateralis was distinguished from its ventral counterpart, the colliculus medialis, by its larger size, its dorsal position, and its excitation by contralateral stimulation. These results support the theory that it is composed of nuclei that are part of the vocal pathway.Prognostic significance of PTEN expression in HER-2-positive breast cancer and its relationship to HER-2 and PTEN expression in adjacent ductal carcinoma in situ lesions.
