The spatial patterns of hatching are species-specific and have probably evolved, in part, as a consequence of changes in embryo morphology and/or position in the uterus. This study was initiated to determine if primate species gestate in the same pattern of groupings. Gestation patterns were compared in 1) captive primates that were regularly interbred and 2) captive primates that were each maintained in a separate social group. Pregnant, "populations" of Macaca mulatta and M. fasc
