Determination of Antioxidant Capacity of Semi-Solid and Liquid Systems Using a Copper-Based Free Radical Scavenging Assay and a Conditional Zinc-Tetraphenylporphyrin Fluorescence Response. A copper-based free radical scavenging assay using 3-(4,5-dimethylthiazol-2-yl)-2,5-diphenyl tetrazolium bromide and a conditional zinc-tetraphenylporphyrin fluorescence response in a semi-solid (4:1, v/v, chloroform:water) and a liquid (alcohol) medium were developed. These models were used to determine the antioxidant capacity (AOC) of natural and pure antioxidants, respectively, belonging to the classes of polyphenols, carotenoids and sulphur compounds. The semi-solid system was useful to determine the AOC of polyphenols and the overall capacity of these compounds being related to their concentration, whereas the liquid system was more suitable for carotenoids. The conditional zinc-tetraphenylporphyrin fluorescence response in a liquid medium was applied for the first time, and the use of a small molecule (azobenzene) as a quencher of the zinc-tetraphenylporphyrin fluorescence allowed to evaluate the AOC of sulphur compounds. In the semi-solid system, comparison with the results obtained from the DPPH assay demonstrated that the copper-based free radical scavenging assay could be applied to evaluate the AOC of antioxidants in natural products.

One of the most remarkable scenes in professional wrestling history has taken place at WrestleMania 34 this past weekend. While there have been some rumors of the match being altered or taken off the card, they have been proven false.
