Kostas Dabis is doing some serious branding work in the beta version of the Google Chrome browser for Windows. The developer has implemented a new logo, a font used for the address and search bars, and a whole new set of icons for bookmarks, history, and history entries. The new chrome logo is different and less reminiscent of the Windows XP and Windows 2000 logos that the browser used in the past. It emphasizes the open source nature of Chrome and moves away from the Windows boxes that have been a familiar part of the Chrome interface for the past several years. The beta also has a sleek and smooth interface which does away with the thick glassy box feel of the past, but it's still consistent with earlier chrome releases. Google is steadily adding more options to the mobile version of its Chrome web browser. The company has managed to launch a new version of its browser app for Windows, Mac, and Linux, designed to offer better support for mobile computers. As first spotted by a user in Google+, the Chromium build for Windows, Mac, and Linux brings some significant changes to the desktop version of the browser. The address and search bars have been moved to the bottom of the screen, with a less-preferred location that's reminiscent of the physical design used by Microsoft's Internet Explorer web browser. Some complaints that the address bar was moved up to the top of the screen have been addressed. I've used Chrome for many years and have to admit that the new placement of the address bar is a bit distracting on my Acer Aspire desktop. The new design also includes the latest Chrome logo in the bottom-left corner and a menu button for accessing settings.

KFC has launched a new campaign to celebrate the global release of the latest Google Plus platform.

The partnership will allow customers to meet the world's first Google Plus profile avatar via the world's largest fast-food chain's logo on its French fry packaging, while also making certain new products and promotions available in eight markets. "Our family has been cooking fried chicken in France since 1888," stated Google's b7e8fdf5c8
