You use the Github web interface to update the source. When you want to update a file in the Github repository, just click on the repository name on the left of the Github web interface and on the file you want to update. This will open an editor for editing the file. Click Update File to update the file. Q: Vim syntax highlighting Python files I'm using VIM through the MacVim (the built-in TextMate one). Can anyone tell me how to get VIM syntax highlighting for Python programs? A: I'm going to assume you mean to use Python-mode in MacVim. If that is the case, then the Vim documentation explains how to add a python.vim file that will be loaded for specific files, see :help syntax-plugin for details. A: For TextMate add a new syntax file for python and

I have a customer app that will eventually make use of data from a third party API in the future. However, I have a requirement that this data be accessible/persistent over the lifetime of the application. To do this, I've been thinking about keeping the data in memory in some central location and just making a REST call to the API when needed. I would like to keep this data in memory so that the app does not have to make a network request each time a read or write is required. However, I do have a requirement that any responses from the API are deserialized into some common C# data structure that can be referenced throughout the app. In terms of Xamarin, how do I go about accomplishing this? My initial thought is to use a Service and have the C# code that consumes the data from the service only make network requests on behalf of the Xamarin Forms app. However, the data cannot persist in memory for the entire application lifetime.

The Service
