Simple methods to determine paracetamol and a combination of paracetamol and caffeine in human plasma are described. The samples are extracted with methanol using a mass of alumina. A following purification step is carried out using a polymeric sorbent. The drugs are determined by reversed phase-HPLC-UV, with diode array and mass-spectrometric detectors. The limits of quantification for paracetamol and a combination of paracetamol and caffeine are 0.04 micrograms/ml and 0.08 micrograms/ml, respectively. The influence of endogenous substances and interferences on the chromatographic and mass spectrometric behaviour are discussed. The proposed methods were successfully used to analyse human plasma samples which had been obtained in two drug-drug-interaction studies: One with a combination of paracetamol and caffeine; the other to a combination of paracetamol and aspirin. In the architecture of a computer system, the term "stack" has been defined by the International Standards Organization (ISO) in ISO/IEC 10996/2006 (Information technology—Open Systems Interconnection—The Directory Interface General Profile) as "an abstract data structure that is used to store program execution information and/or results." Stacks are used to store several types of information, including return addresses, local data, parameters, global data, and exception data. In a superscalar processor architecture, register renaming is the act of changing the physical names of particular registers (used for holding a value passed into or returned from a function) to numbers assigned to an arbitrary numbering, typically, with the first register renaming number (RRN) assigned to a
