Although many promising approaches have been developed to target the genetic and epigenetic vulnerabilities unique to individual tumors, the response rates of patients to such therapies have been unsatisfactory. Thus, novel treatment approaches are urgently needed. In recent years, a new paradigm for cancer therapy has emerged, called precision medicine. Precision medicine, as defined by the National Institutes of Health (NIH), refers to a disease-modifying, disease-specific intervention that is based on individual variations in a patient's characteristics that are relevant to the etiology or prognosis of a disease. As this new paradigm receives increasing attention, an increasing number of high-throughput technologies are being developed to guide cancer therapy for individual patients. However, the current practice is expensive, difficult, and requires cumbersome protocols to identify new molecular targets. Furthermore, the successful use of such technologies requires highly skilled experts and a large investment of resources. Therefore, these approaches are not practical for routine clinical practice. To overcome these difficulties, our goal is to develop a novel technology that can be applied to routine clinical practice. The long-term goal of our research is to develop a relatively inexpensive technology that enables clinicians to make precise predictions of the response of patients to therapy in real time by analysing only a few tumor cells obtained from a biopsy sample. Our team is currently developing a novel technology that enables us to perform single-cell sequencing and methylation analyses using only a few cells obtained from a biopsy sample. We have recently successfully established a method to efficiently extract and analyze methylated DNA from a small amount of tissue. In the proposed research, we will apply this method to biopsy samples from patients with non-small-cell lung cancer to identify genome-wide methylation-based biomarkers to predict the response of the patient to epidermal growth factor receptor (EGFR) tyros is the programming that we use behind the scenes to make www.kktoy.com into one of the premiere cycling resource web sites on the web. For example, when you click on "Learn French," it goes off and does all the work of translating the French into English. If you click on the article "Cycling for the Healthy Life," it goes and does all the work of translating it into English and then puts it onto your page with all the buttons at the bottom that allow people to email you. This is where we source and provide all the content on the site, and this is the "Help Desk" site. Some other work we do to provide you with content: We provide content to the public: When you submit a speech contest entry, we populate your public page with the event information. When you enter rides or race results, we fill your public page with that information. We even do the heavy work of keeping our public and staff pages filled with great information for you to scroll through and read. We create custom pages: We create custom pages whenever we get a request. For example, if you give us a URL for a news article, we can quickly create a page just for that URL. In addition, we periodically create custom pages on our staff pages whenever something new comes across our desks that we think you may find useful. We run the software: The KKToy.com board runs on an SqlServer database, so in addition to coding the HTML that shows up on the WWW, we also need to code the application that will do the event management, the race management, and the posting of new events. We need to code some type of plug-in that allows people to type in search terms and send them to their results page, for example. In addition, all of the information on the site is cached and stored on an SqlServer DB, so if the database goes down, then all of the information that is available for the site (event information, race results, news articles) will be offline, and when the database comes back on-line, the information will immediately go live. This is another part of the "HelpDesk" project mentioned above. We provide content to the public Most of our site's programming can easily be viewed by clicking on the
