There are two principal categories of infrared detectors, the first including the radiation or bolometer detector, which converts infrared radiation to thermal energy and the second category including the quantum type detector, which detects infrared energy by direct absorption. In the past, a bolometer detector used for use in the pulse modulated mode has commonly been limited to a very narrow field of view by a mechanical obstruction. This mechanical obstruction was commonly referred to as a pellicle cell to define the field of view as the distance between the pellicle cell and the bolometer detector was fixed.
