Being a late convert to the new generation of interactive fiction games, I have only been playing a few years now, and so for all I have experienced there is still so much more to discover. What I found interesting is how the recently released game The Book of Unwritten Tales II seems to have opened a door which leads to a very different approach to game design, one where you can more easily explore deeply into the realm of the subconscious, and I found myself looking forward to The Signifier as I know I would have to return for more once I had finished this game. While most of the existing books-based Interactive Fiction games seem to be centered around exploring this and other worlds around the player, The Signifier takes it all to a very literal place. Using the location as a way of exploring and investigating this being beyond reality, it allows you to dream up and bring a story to life within an entirely interactive space. The player is presented with a notepad, a simple but effective note pad which will allow you to note down your thoughts and ideas, but also draw objects or characters in order to examine them more closely and reveal their nature. During the course of the game the player can then add further objects and characters to the notepad, so that a fully fledged story is created that the player can investigate further, or add to as they see fit. As you would expect from any text adventure game, the player will have the ability to speak to their character in order to get to know them a little better, and also add further dialog options by simply pressing the '>' key. As you can expect from a text adventure game, The Signifier is relatively straightforward in terms of how you can play it, but what it does with that simplicity is amazing. While most books based games may allow you to jump straight into a world you have never been in before, you may not have much of a clue of how to interact with things, or of what is going on in the story, and that can often be a little frustrating. The Signifier takes on this challenge by creating a world that is, on the face of it, very simple to interact with, but yet it not only allows the player to explore this world in all of it's depth, but to express their imagination and play to their hearts content. As far as I know, the game has a basic, but simple, puzzle system, and does not require you to solve puzzles to progress further. However, on the face

Expanding the color tokens from any of the color schemes provides you full control over the appearance of the user or host (note that the tokens will still be shown hidden on the colorscheme to which you are currently connecting). To expand a color token simply right-click on the respective token (typically the user's name or host) and select the "expand" option on the shortcut menu. Text highlighting in the echo screen is no longer applied to the expanded tokens since the color tokens overwrite the color schemes tokens
