The literature lacks well-established patient satisfaction instruments in the electronic health record (EHR) context. We developed and validated an electronic version of the Adult Satisfaction Questionnaire (ASQ-9) for measuring satisfaction with clinical practice, hospital care, and the quality of information and communication in the EHR. The patient satisfaction questionnaire was distributed to 902 North Carolina adults who had used the EHR within the past three months. Using a stratified sample, a two-phase design was used to validate the questionnaire. The questionnaire demonstrated good internal consistency and test-retest reliability. Construct validity was assessed by means of confirmatory factor analysis, convergent and discriminant validity, and item response theory. The association between ASQ-9 and the Work Environment Questionnaire and the Patient Activation Measure was used to assess convergent and discriminant validity. The questionnaire also demonstrated adequate test-retest reliability. In study 1 (n = 279), factor analysis showed a three-factor model: clinical practice, information, and communication. In study 2 (n = 625), factor analysis resulted in three factors: clinical practice, information and communication, and care quality. Confirmatory factor analysis supported the proposed two-factor solution. Overall response rate in the validity study was 33.9% (n = 137). Results of a Rasch analysis confirmed the relationship between ASQ-9 factors and Work Environment Questionnaire (WEQ) factors. The confirmatory factor analysis results suggested a unique and internally consistent set of items for measuring patient satisfaction. The ASQ-9 is recommended for use in future studies to assess satisfaction in patients with chronic e79caf774b
