Never heard of Wes Anderson? Let me explain: Mr. Anderson, a 53-year-old director now known for such acidly funny (but emotionally complex) projects as “Rushmore” and the new “Moonrise Kingdom,” has built a national reputation based on the precise crafting of movies so smart that even people who have already been to college have to laugh at them again. The director’s reputation is under siege because he has created a series of films that have defied typecasting. So he can say things about the movie business that many filmmakers can only dream of and still be able to stand tall. A magnificent piece of gallery-worthy work, “Moonrise Kingdom” is an endearing romantic comedy about 12-year-old rich kids who accidentally run away to an idyllic Swiss countryside after a game of hide-and-seek and spend their time trying to rekindle a romance that started when they were 10. Mr. Anderson’s combination of style and substance is a common thread in his work — and also a formula that occasionally carries a film off the rails. So it was a relief that “Moonrise Kingdom” was a total delight, a nonstop candy coated good time. The tone comes from Mr. Anderson’s attention to the smallest details, as in the way the film was shot, with close-ups of characters’ faces pressed against the windshield of a car and then cut sharply away as if by design. At the same time, his camera is loose and adrift, rambling over the landscape in a way that adds a dimension of otherworldly melancholy. A shot of a house appears in a few different places and at different angles, as if the house itself were the one thing in the movie that wouldn’t stay still. As for the animation, the film was created entirely by hand, which is a detail that makes it stand apart from most other films. Mr. Anderson is a fascinating artist, a perfectionist with an almost manic attention to detail. Like someone who has crafted a book on a sewing machine, he is skilled at teasing out every nuance of the film, from the drawings in the workbook Mr. Anderson used
