Actions performed in the game world are physical (teleportation, flight, etc.), magical (fireballs, ice darts, etc.) and recovery (health potions). Players can also use the environment to protect themselves from enemy attacks, fight off monsters, and open/close doors to other areas. Players can have up to three companions accompanying them on their adventure. These companions will be at their disposal and will aid the player during combat and exploration. Hello DFL'ers!! The word overall (not just singularity, but within the word) gives rise to some interesting questions and ideas I am playing with. I'll be citing Everett here, but at no time attempting to "prove" his philosophy. I'm in general agreement with it, and there are parts I do not agree with, however, I find this use of his idea in the word brilliant. I'll start with a parallel example. When you hear a soprano sing, the audience does not say that it is impossible for a soprano to sing. A soprano has been born, once perhaps, a soprano sang. I can be all skeptical and say that there is no such woman on this planet at this time or has any chance at all. Yet, I still exist. Where is that negation? There are possibilities, but maybe not probabilities. That's what I say is possible. I speak my assumptions and can be proven to be correct or false in time. Now take the word "singularity". No, I don't agree with everything he says, but he says something that I think is interesting, so... One key concept is that of an unevidenced assumption. Current culture and science are based on people believing an idea. For example, the idea that light is a wave. Newton and others got it right. Bohr shifted the idea to protons and electrons, which wasn't wrong. Einstein went farther and shifted the idea to imagine that some of the objects being described are the same particle-antiparticle pair. Again this seemed a reasonable interpretation of what they were doing, and it still is, but where did he get this idea from? the thought. He made an unevidenced assumption that seemed reasonable at the time, but to us today is clear as mud. What if the idea that all conceptual frames extend to all unify is incorrect-what if the world we experience through our conceptual frame is in fact an universe that we see through a singularity? Therefore, nothing we experience is proof or even possibility. - I always want to throw in a list of "why doesn't it have to be that way?" and all the answers to that. Believing this is a philosophical argument, one can go on to note that "the evidence is still unclear and inconclusive, my assumption still maintains it is possible, and thus there is no Sing
