The movie director, Takashi Miike (who is not in the movie), first became famous when he filmed a fight scene from Fist of Legend by Bruce Lee and edited it such that it became a surreal, surrealistic fight. This pursuit of Tetsuo is also what at the end of the movie, Kaiji is out to pursue. In the film's history, the production company struggled with the way the movie should be viewed, whether it should be seen as an action film, a sequel, or a rare genre film exploring the mystery of the mind, a film about madness, or a film about forgiveness. Many people said Kaiji should not be called a "action film" but rather a philosophical film. This was even expressed by most of the major actors. After it became a dramatic horror movie, the film became the most expensive film in all of the world, surpassing the yearly budget of The Matrix. It was the biggest grossing horror film of all time, I believe. Some people commented about the subliminal message in the film that is somehow connected to American films such as Marathon Man or The Exorcist, as in "revenge is just a dream."
