Sometimes I find myself talking in the opening scene of an important scene, and then I end up forgetting what I was going to say. Other times I get stuck on a really bad idea that turns out pretty good and a lot better than it should have been. So I went looking for a way of avoiding the bad idea, and I found it. An amazing way of stopping me getting stuck on an idea is to ask myself in this way, "Is what I have so far working?" I wrote a scene like this: Lily heard the postman's footsteps growing steadily nearer. She had been worrying about the postman coming in now, and she was almost certain that she had not said everything she wanted to say. He would notice her upset tone and see how easily she could be deflated. But of course he was already there, and he had actually opened his mail bag in the hall and had found the next thing in. Then he had done his awkward salute. Was he sorry for her? Did he think her husband had died? Did he know about her mother, her elder sister and her brother-in-law? All these questions had happened to Lily before and they would happen again. If anyone had died it would be her family. But she had always managed to answer the questions that arose. "I'll be down in a minute," she said. She wanted to make her hand shake as little as possible. The postman had known how to manage this in the past. Then she turned back to her desk. It was only three days since she had seen her mother for the last time, and she had so much to do. She needed to have a serious conversation with her sister. The phone rang. It was her sister. She would have to go down to the café and talk to her brother, too. He had wanted to talk about how she was going to start her new life, not necessarily as a doctor, but as a dentist. She could not even begin to solve all these problems in the time allowed. Lily
