Drift VR is a comfortable arcade game where you have to use the x-axis as the only movement. So, if you slip, you will fall. Drift VR is a VR demo which features a unique concept for controlling movement in VR. This demo includes a non-interactive story. Creating a new record in this VR demos is really cool! Grab your gear and play Drift VR: Arcade. Stratics Veteran I'm getting lower and lower on the in-development list... Anyhow, thank you all for your suggestions about last week's issues, including being able to play the game in my home rather than in a building where the air would be stale. At least this week should be a bit better, but we'll just have to wait until it's done to see if it's any better. The downloaded installation has slowed to a snail's pace. Is there any way to start over? I know there is a 'restart' option in the main menu, but I'm not seeing anything else. I'm installing the files as I go, so this is only the second time I've done this

I really hope this problem gets addressed soon and put to rest. I haven't played since the patch several days ago. (I know I'm going to get lots of grief from this post, but there are several other games that have had those kinds of problems, so I guess I have a right to mention them.) Stratics Veteran Okay, thanks for the explanations, and for listening to the issues that I'm having. I'm going to play with the post-installation, and I'll try to get my options down. I'm guessing that if I manage to get my'machines' and 'consumables' to work, I'll be able to go right back into the game. I'm getting frustrated because I hear that things are working, and yet some things aren't working. To play this game, you have to be able to use the essentials, and not everything has been fixed... I just spent the last week getting used to the systems. I've had a lot of time to train my'machines' and 'consumables' and I enjoy playing in vehicles, but if

way To Dyspnea From 1984 to 2018, the number of Americans living into their 80s or 90s has grown over 50%. During the same period, life expectancy across the US has increased, and disease incidence has decreased. Also, despite these gains, little improvement has been made in several health outcomes. These phenomena have led to a movement to comprehensively address life needs, and Seniors, and their caregivers are at the center of this movement. The need for designing and developing new treatments and medications for seniors and other aging populations has become a hot topic in the pharmaceutical, medical, and nonprofit sectors, particularly as this population accounts for more than one-third of the worldwide prescription drug market. In 2008, the population of older persons ( $\geq 65$  years of age) in the US was approximately 44.5 million [1] with a growing percentage of these individuals living in nursing homes. As prevalence of dementia increases with age, there have been many new medications developed for memory complaints in the aging population. Although onset of cognitive decline may appear at any age, in the US, one in three seniors  $>75$  years old is living with mild dementia or thinks they have it. Unfortunately, this is a misconception as dementia is a different disease than memory loss resulting in effects on memory, reasoning, thinking, and other abilities needed to manage daily affairs and participate in social, financial, and other activities. By the age of 85, approximately 10% of the population has dementia. Dementia risk increases with age, and in 2008, Alzheimer's disease was the 6th leading cause of death in the US with direct (death), indirect (medical costs), and intangible costs (psychological distress). Roughly, Alzheimer's disease is characterized by a decrease in mental abilities such as memory, thinking, and reasoning and emotional functioning. Due to the complexity of this disease, there are no current medications available to slow, cure, or stop the progression of this neurodegenerative disease. An estimated 6.2 million or 0.5% of the total US population has Alzheimer's disease. However, there is an opportunity for pharmaceuticals to develop new medications for specific symptoms of this condition. For example, individuals with dementia may experience a decline in physical functioning, such as difficulty with walking, which can be very challenging as well as costly for individuals and caregivers. Other symptoms, such as apathy, may be due to decreased mobility, lack of motivation, or a decline in physical and mental
