ANOTHER GOOD NEWS IS ON ITS WAY EVIL SURVIVORS AND EVIL SOMETHING GROWS FAST. YES-YES, I NEED MORE EXPOSURE HONESTLY, I'M A ROBOT YEAH, I AM COMPETITIVE LET ME HAVE SOME FUN I AM VENDOR BONUS, I AM THE AMAZING MOM Postnatal exposure to lipopolysaccharide alters cytokine expression and behavior in an offspring model of maternal immune activation. Human perinatal mental disorders are most likely caused by subtle changes in the fetal

brain. Maternal immune activation during pregnancy is a risk factor for such disorders. Because maternal lipopolysaccharide (LPS) administration during pregnancy induces long-term neurobehavioral deficits in the offspring, we decided to investigate whether postnatal LPS administration affects behavioral and cytokine responses in adult offspring. To this end, pregnant dams received intraperitoneal injections with LPS (100 µg/kg) or saline during the last week of gestation. Offspring were injected with LPS (50 µg/kg) or saline at postnatal day (P) 7 and 12. Two weeks later, adult offspring were subjected to behavioral tests and analyses of cytokine expression in the prefrontal cortex. Postnatal exposure to LPS impaired fear-related defensive behaviors in adulthood in association with a decrease in interleukin (IL)-6 and IL-10 expression in the prefrontal cortex of offspring. Furthermore, in contrast with the control group, cytokine expression of tumor necrosis factor (TNF)-α was down-regulated in the prefrontal cortex of LPS-injected offspring compared to the control group. These results suggest that exposure to LPS during early postnatal life may affect the prefrontal cortex, Motor vehicles, such as light-duty automobiles and light-duty trucks, provide key benefits to the American economy, including access to mobility, affordability, and quality products and services. Unfortunately, automotive accidents and collisions are among the leading causes of death and serious injuries, and, in part, due to imprecise measurement of vehicle speed. Vehicle speed is based, in part, on how accurately the elapsed time between an object's arrival at a reference point and an observer's observation of that arrival is measured. Generally, two approaches are used to measure elapsed time, a mechanical approach (e.g., using a watch, stopwatch, clock, etc.) and an electronic approach (e.g., using a vehicle's stop watch, speed-sensitive trip counter, etc.). In the current art, these two approaches are used in conjunction with one another. When a mechanical approach is used, a reference point is typically the car's windshield. However, in cars with no windshield, reference points include objects that can be observed against a surface the vehicle is traveling against, such as, for example, a tachometer, an oil pressure gauge, a gas gauge, the headlights of oncoming vehicles, or the scenery and/or inanimate objects the car is traveling past. When an electronic approach is used, a reference point is typically the speedometer of the vehicle. However, in automobiles with no speedometer or where the speedometer is not visible to the driver, reference points include objects that can be observed against a surface the vehicle
