Q: What is the expression, "to do as if your right hand was tied"? I came across an expression, I don't know where: "to do as if your right hand was tied" What does this mean exactly? A: This means: To do (or say or think) something to the point of monotony. to do (or say or think) something to the point of monotony (MW, BD) If a person says or does something (e.g. a letter) for a long time, but the letter is the same as last time, then the person says or does (e.g.) the letter as if his or her right hand is tied. (Cambridge Online Dictionary) A: I would translate it as One does something as if one had a pencil between one's fingers or perhaps more simply One does something as one would with a pencil in one's hand. Scooping generalist: A bot crawls the web for good documents The web is chock full of interesting documents, and some of them can be really useful. One site, though, indexes all the files on the web so you can search for the ones you want. This site, known as The Web-doc and quite frankly the best thing in the universe, offers a search box and some good example searches in response to them. Among my favorite results: * Cats. A list of documents about cats, from Wikipedia, Yahoo Answers, and an assortment of other sites. * Imelda Marcos, former First Lady of the Philippines, after her arrest for corruption. A list of the stuff she wore on her feet while running for office and since. * Wikipedia: The encyclopedia you want, friend. They've already done all the legwork for you. Nice! And much more to search for, if you have time on your hands. (For the real adventure, try search for your own name: a whole host of documents fleshed out your personal existence!)The Phoenix Suns were one of the most pleasant surprises in the NBA this season, and whether it was by design or not, Phoenix has once again compiled a roster that could come to the NBA Finals. The Phoenix Suns have not only assembled a roster of players that could rival that of the Minnesota Timberwolves in the NBA Playoffs,

A recent Freedom of Information Act request by The Guardian has resulted in the release of a series of emails between the US Defense Department and State Department officials detailing how the latter monitored and responded to "jihadist chatter" during a key 2009 visit by foreign minister Hillary Clinton. In a BBC Radio 4 programme, cited by the Guardian, titled The Americans and the Jihad, US scholar Thomas Joscelyn suggested the e-mails came to light because of two pressures: "First of all, the Freedom of Information Act was instituted by President Nixon and so it was always designed to promote transparency in government," he said. "The email archive didn't exist before 2005 because it was not digitised. So by the time the archive became digitised and was opened up to requesters under the Freedom of Information Act, it was there as an archive of records that could be studied. "As for the second, the emails were leaked by a group which was very hostile to the United States – the hacktivist collective Wikileaks – I think that had a lot to do with the fact that they realised they had a lot of information that was embarrassing to the US government that they'd been collecting for years and they decided that it was in the public interest to have that information go public." The Guardian reports: In the emails, the officials mapped out a strategy for how to respond to the threat posed by jihadi chatter to the visit. Their options included flying another mission of aircraft to Algeria to prevent a near miss between a US airliner and a terrorist aircraft on the ground, or perhaps a joint military exercise. Some of the officials even suggested intercepting an alleged al-Qaida operative trying to reach Syria, or dismantling a drone at the end of her visit to ensure that the threat had been averted. The US officials also discussed coming up with a plan to "create a planeload of hens" – a common symbol for jihad – for Hillary Clinton to hand to the president of Algeria, Abdelaziz Bouteflika. But, according to the Guardian report, the State Department responded that "it would be a security issue to create a planeload of hens for Clinton to carry on the aircraft during the Algerian president's state visit." This is a response which has been widely misunderstood. The Guardian explains: In the e-mails, the officials map out a strategy for how to respond to the threat posed
