Over the past several years, the amount of data stored or otherwise communicated over various networks has increased exponentially. As the amount of data increases and evolves, the number of data transmission devices that handle or otherwise process this data has also increased. For example, in the early 1990s, thousands of computers and other computing-related devices (such as, for example, personal digital assistants (PDAs), cell phones, pagers, etc.) were coupled to a variety of networks (e.g., time division multiplexing (TDM) and asynchronous transfer mode (ATM) networks) that are used to communicate data. In particular, the older Internet Protocol (IP) network (referred to as the "IP stack") ran out of addresses and the growth of the number of devices coupled to the IP network caused IP routing to become a significant problem. In response, the present assignee developed Ethernet address translation (or translating) hardware and software that allowed IP devices to send and receive packets regardless of their physical addresses. In particular, Ethernet address translation (EAT) would allow a network to handle a large number of IP devices, i.e., the network would handle a high volume of IP traffic without the need to dramatically increase the number of available IP addresses. One disadvantage of the early Ethernet address translation (EAT) technology, however, was that it only supported full Ethernet. More specifically, the EAT technology was limited to working with VLANs, and if a network supported only full Ethernet, it was required to use one form of EAT. As a result, end users of Ethernet based networks needed one Ethernet address translation (EAT) device to handle the entire network, and this significantly increased the cost of the network. Although the present assignee's EAT software has continued to evolve, the above-mentioned shortcomings of the early EAT devices are still present. In particular, these problems include the inability to process partial Ethernet traffic, increased hardware, maintenance, and power consumption, as well as scaling issues

"Jam Squad: Hyper Jam is a fantastic 2v2 team-based shooter with a focus on team coordination and a pro-level mix of player movement. Hyper Jam was crafted by Japt Senior Director Jan Kopacek, and it's his first game. Unlike most of the titles in the indie scene, Hyper Jam requires some time to learn, but it's well worth the effort. About Hyper Jam: Hyper Jam is a well-rounded, team-oriented, 3v3 game.
