With the availability of cheap ways to develop and test blockchain prototypes in smart contract development kits (SDKs), the exploration of blockchain has, since the spring of 2017, been moving from the fringes of the cryptographic community to mainstream technological development. One of the critical elements in the process of blockchain development has been the need to think through each step of the process for each feature of the technology. After all, blockchain uses a public distributed ledger (DLT) to record transactions and record ownership, among other use cases. Where does the private/public dichotomy set up? How does a user perform actions? Does each action have a tag/attachment? Do users pay one another? How do users get paid? How do exchanges get paid? How do miners get paid? What is the legal framework for it all? As one example, the developers at btct.com built a beta version of their blockchain-based platform titled "Blockchain Artificial Intelligence." Using their API, users can build their own blockchain testnets, where they can create and manage smart contracts. Such a testnet can mimic the main network and allow users to test various features of the blockchain. The btct.com team has built blockchain platforms for specific use cases: breathing: detecting possible hospital infection scenarios; voting: dealing with elections, political positions and outcomes; and dental pain ap that records dental pain incidents in a real-time, verifiable and immutable database, with built-in scoring algorithms that provide a rating based on severity. While reading a white paper on btct.com, it's obvious that the developers have built it with an intent to have an early version launch soon. To this end,

I have a few classes, and I want to make a generic function that will take my classes and list all the properties and their types for me. Is this possible? A: You are looking for reflection. Here is a very basic example that will go through all public properties of a type and provide the type and name (you'll need a using System.Reflection to get that to compile): public class Program { public static void Main() { var type = typeof(Program); var properties = type.GetProperties(); foreach (var properties) { Console.WriteLine("Property: {0} - Type: {1}", property.Name, property.PropertyType); } } } To get "protected" and "internal" properties, you have to add the following to the top of the class: [AttributeUsage(AttributeTargets.Property)] public class ProtectedName : Attribute { } [AttributeUsage(AttributeTargets.Property)] public class ProtectedName : Attribute { } [AttributeUsage(AttributeTargets.Property)] public class InternalName : Attribute { } [AttributeUsage(AttributeTar
