This new technology was inspired by how fans, commentators and producers use game data to create content and enhance the experience in FIFA. EA's best game data engineers have built this new feature using the data from professional, high-intensity matches, which has resulted in a new player movement system that captures a wider variety of moves and off-ball actions. Also included in the game is "Pace Run" technology, which gives players the ability to run with real-world speed based on how fast they run in motion capture suits. The player can sprint, sprint with longer acceleration, change their direction mid-movement, and use various actions to demonstrate their ability.

Life-threatening airway stenosis resulting from deoxyribonuclease 2 reactivation. Airway stenosis is a rare adverse event following administration of interferon-alpha (IFN-alpha) and pegylated IFN-alpha in chronic hepatitis C patients. Here we report on a patient who developed an acute life-threatening airway stenosis in the absence of parenteral IFN-alpha. The patient had exhibited hyperbilirubinemia and an elevated alkaline phosphatase associated with increased transaminases and total bilirubin due to decompensated liver cirrhosis. Twelve days following the initial therapy with pegylated IFN-alpha 2a, a type 2 pneumonitis developed, associated with hemoptysis and dyspnea. Bronchoscopy with bronchoalveolar lavage showed marked neutrophil and eosinophil infiltration. The etiology of the airway stenosis was found to be deoxyribonuclease 2 (DNase 2) intoxication with its gene expression increased by IFN-alpha in vivo. The reaction from overexpressed DNase 2 might have been accelerated, thereby resulting in airway stenosis. Consequently, hyperproduction of DNase 2 may be considered as a target molecule to prevent pegylated IFN-alpha associated side-effects in liver disease.
