FIGURE 2-4: Photoshop has a very powerful and feature-rich user interface that enables working with layers in a nonlinear way, enabling you to position layers, blend them, and create composition effects. The big advantage of Photoshop over other types of graphic programs is that it allows you to work with many layers at once—and to arrange these layers in a nonlinear way. This means that you can change a photograph's appearance simply by moving the layers around. You can even change the image in a nonsubjective way, as you add or remove color, shadows, and highlights.

Post-Production Software for Photographers: The Key Elements of a Good Post-Production Software for Photographers Color Grading: Photoshop The process of fine-tuning the color to the image's requirements is called Color Grading. One of the most important and demanding elements of a high-quality photo is the color, or in other words the hue, saturation and tone. Therefore, color grading is a specialized process that works with these three major components of color. Photoshop is the most famous application used for Color Grading. Many photographers use Photoshop for this process. It is the most popular software used by them. Some photographers do not prefer Photoshop for this process due to the long procedure required for completing the task. This means that Photoshop creates the image file and saves it. However, if your photo has some problems, you cannot do anything about it until the photo is saved. Because the image has problems, it will always be saved. This process of saving the image can continue over and over again until the photographer finally gets the right result. In addition, the output files may result in a large file size and time-consuming process. So, if you do not want to face a long process or a big file size, it is better to switch to a cheaper alternative. Approaches to facilitating birth preparedness among pregnant couples in a perinatal bereavement programme: A qualitative study. The objective of this study was to explore approaches used to facilitate birth preparedness among pregnant couples in an antenatal bereavement programme. Women newly grieving the loss of their infant were enrolled in the 16-week Bereavement-Adapted Pregnancy Programme in hospital (BC, Canada), a voluntary perinatal bereavement programme. All bereaved couples participated in the study. This study was qualitative; each woman was interviewed once, and each husband was interviewed twice. Interviews were audiorecorded and transcribed. Transcripts were analysed using content analysis. Couples were asked what approaches they had used to facilitate birth preparedness, and whether or not, they had any further thoughts regarding this approach. All couples completed the programme and had a surviving infant by the time of the interviews. Twenty-five couples participated in the study. All couples identified some actions that would help them prepare. These included obtaining written information, making plans, and keeping an antenatal book. A positive attitude helped couples to be able to prepare. Couples emphasized the importance of support to prepare. Many couples held conflicting attitudes about the time of birth and their role in the process of giving birth. Their ambivalence about timing and parturition influenced the way they prepared. The positive impact of having birth preparedness information was articulated by many. Losing the baby was the hardest thing in their lives and they felt unprepared for the loss. This may have led to some couples being unprepared for the birth of their surviving infant.

LONDON — The Vatican said on Sunday that it would no longer close the tombs of popes in the cemetery behind the cathedral in Saint Peter's Square. It said the change, in a response to changing circumstances, would begin with the tombs of St. Pius X and St. John XXIII, both of whom died in 1958. After close to 10 years of a debate about moving or consolidating the cemetery, the decision on Sunday was made by Cardinal Angelo Amato, the Vatican's chief administrator, after consultation with Monsignor Guglielmo Miele, the prefect of the basilica and former director of the Vatican Museums. It was announced in a statement on the basilica's website. The decision to close the cemetery was made in 2013 by Pope Benedict XVI, who wrote to the archbishop of Milan,
