5-Year Old Patient. Clostridium difficile (C. difficile) is the leading cause of hospital acquired diarrhea.
The Center for Disease Control (CDC) updated the guidelines for the treatment of C. difficile from 2009 to 2014. The majority of C. difficile infections occur in the community, however, the incidence of C. difficile in dermatology is not reported. We present a case of an adult patient with a diagnosis of dermatitis herpetiformis with erosive small bowel disease in whom a C. difficile infection was diagnosed. Infection with C. difficile presents as diarrhea with history of antibiotic therapy. Clinical suspicion of C. difficile infection should prompt rapid testing and treatment. Absence of a social facilitation effect in rapid-serial visual presentation. In two experiments, we compared the consistency of the effect of the temporal proximity (i.e., temporal contiguity) of successive IAPS (International Affective Picture System) pictures (Moradi et al., 1998) on the evaluative ratings of participants who viewed the pictures serially. In both experiments, we manipulated the temporal context under which IAPS was presented during the experiment. In Experiment 1, participants viewed the IAPS presented sequentially or simultaneously. In Experiment 2, we used a randomized mixed block design to manipulate the temporal context of IAPS presentation. The result of Experiment 1 showed that the ratings of the pictures presented in the two contexts were not significantly different. In contrast, the result of Experiment 2 showed that the rating of the pictures presented in the context of a sequential presentation of nonhuman pictures was higher than that of the pictures presented in the context 648931e174
