What's new in N.U.T.Z.:

Mygnar is a former municipality in the canton of Ticino in Switzerland. It is the easternmost municipality of the canton of Ticino and lies in the northern foothills of Monte Ceneri and near the Italian border. On 1 January 2012 the municipality was incorporated into the larger neighboring municipalities of Pella, Santa Maria in Bosco, Carona and Denti. The Swiss population swelled since Roman times to the north, east and south of the chapel of Maria Semplice. The population remained high until the end of the 19th century after which a sawing mill on the banks of the Arfi brought significant new settlers. Today about half of the population makes their living with agriculture and forestry. History Pre-Roman era The area in which today exists the village of Mygnar has been inhabited for a long time, at least since the Bronze Age. When Strabo described the city of Alessandria, he mentioned this Ticino region between Splügen Pass and Campodolcino and the Verze/Val Breugna. Until the fourth century BC the eastward expansion of Ticino was in parallel to a southward expansion, which could also have had an ice-free road to the Aegean region, south of the Po Plain. The Danube also played an important role in the region. The territory of the Roman region of Istria is sometimes mentioned. Roman era to Middle Ages The region of Mygnar was part of the Roman province of Pannonia. The community of Castra Heribersis was not rebuilt, but it had a civilian settlement with a temple. For more than a thousand years the villa was protected by a defensive tower. Ticino was conquered by barbarian tribes in the 4th century; they not only fought in battles and raids, but also built new settlements on the road to the north. The central valley of the Ticino was thus settled by the Alemanni, who built a number of Rhine-way castles, also on the side of the municipality. The Roman era ended with the coming of the Lombards in 582 and the settlement of Milan. The territory of Mygnar was again inhabited by Lombards in the 8th century, and they held it until 784. The settlements of Aosta (Castelgermo) and Primiero followed the administration on both sides of the Arvi

I am a little wary of the round-robin-is-better-than-switch-a-packet mentality that TCP has... I have read all the agreed-upon TCP/IP specifications, and I like the simplicity of them - but I feel like there is a bit of an overdependence on TCP across much of the net - especially I am thinking of the HTTP world where it seems like people are trying to replicate the world
