The question I have is: is this project worth developing for. I have never done anything with RAP but I have done quite a bit with other java frameworks. A: What kind of project is it? RAP is a general framework for desktop applications. You can use a RAP application to build a web application, but the desktop is a much easier target than the web, and the generated code works on the desktop. Furthermore, you can generate code at runtime with RAP, so you can create a desktop app that generates the necessary code at runtime. For example, you could create a desktop app that lets you create a new system account, and then generates some code for you that you can put in the Linux /etc/passwd file. On the web, you can use RAP to generate code that is served by an application server, so you can create an application with RAP, and still get the benefits of having a pre-compiled app available. A: Why not have a look at Tuxedo, it's another RAP-App that comes with a "full" AD-Service for doing the Financial accounting in AD-Notker and OpenERP.
