This study examined the effects of atropine and placebo on anxiety and pain. A double-blind placebo-controlled study was performed. Forty-four subjects were randomly assigned to receive atropine (0.4 mg/70 kg), placebo, or no medication. Following medication, subjects were tested in one of three clinical situations: Anxiety Scale of Rosenzweig and Sims, Positive Affect Scale of Jacoby, and Modified University of Michigan Pain Scale. The results show that atropine increased heart rate and decreased perceived anxiety and pain and did not change perceived anxiety, pain, or heart rate in the no-medication condition. Atropine in the placebo condition did not change heart rate or perceived anxiety or pain. In a second session a week later, atropine reduced perceived anxiety and pain. Atropine reduced perceived anxiety, pain, and heart rate in the no-medication condition and did not change heart rate or perceived anxiety or pain in the placebo condition. Atropine reduced perceived anxiety and pain in the placebo condition.
