I've installed a bunch of network drives, but cannot seem to find a way to completely remove them. On Vista you can right click and remove, but it's not there on XP. I need to remove these drives (as I didn't have them connected when I installed them) but I would really rather not have to go through every single one. Is there a way to remove them? Thanks in advance. A: Go to Control Panel\System and Security\System. Under Advanced system settings, you'll see a "Remove the device" option. This will remove the disks from the list, but you'll still be able to access them using \\servername. 17.10.2008 It's been a while since I posted on these pages. The reason? I couldn't find any words to describe how I felt about this country, which I love so dearly. I haven't even had the time to pay attention to foreign news. As our military left a long time ago, I am now left with my children and my husband to cope with the present circumstances. I have no regrets about that; in fact, I think it is a gift. However, I do miss the years when I was able to read the printed word and reflect upon the quality of our society and the values we hold dear. I am fascinated by the fact that there are protesters who, in the face of their countrymen, feel that they have a duty to express their opinions about what they perceive to be a dangerous and dictatorial regime. They pay a heavy price for that. I never heard of anyone

Conclusion ===== Our results showed that plasma HVA level and NO concentration were significantly lower in subjects with hypertension than those without hypertension. Remarkably, plasma levels of HVA and NO were positively correlated with each other. Therefore, it was proposed that HVA plays an important role in the NO production and vascular function may be associated with the elevated plasma HVA level. However, there were still a number of limitations in our study. Firstly, the number of participants in our study is relatively small, which may affect the reliability of the present data. Secondly, this study is a cross-sectional study, and the results were affected by the retrospective study. Finally, because of lack of outcome data, the relationship of HVA and NO with target-organ damage could not be analyzed. A longitudinal study to investigate the association between plasma HVA level and NO level and cardiovascular events will be required in the future.
