A prospective study was conducted to identify the characteristics of these patients and to determine whether, in addition to existing treatments, acupuncture is helpful for long-term pain relief. Fifty-one patients who had at least 3 years of follow-up after surgery were enrolled in the study. The patients were requested to fill out a questionnaire before surgery and again 4 and 12 months later. The patients were treated by acupuncture in 3 waves, separated by at least 10 weeks, and then received traditional medical treatment for pain relief. Forty-five patients (88%) responded to the questionnaire at follow-up. All reported continued knee pain with a visual analogue score (VAS) of at least 3 cm on a scale of 0 to 10 cm. Acupuncture was effective, with a mean VAS of 3 cm at follow-up, compared to a preoperative VAS of 7 cm.

However, the only factor that had a significant impact on the intensity of the pain was the patients' expectation of the treatment (P =.02), implying that patients are inclined to expect that acupuncture will be a good treatment for their long-term pain if they rate it high on a VAS before the treatment.Q: No amount of bounty rep will stack on user's rep. - Is this right?
