One of the requirements for the safe transport of food and beverage containers is that the container, after filling, should have a seal that prevents contact between the filling material and oxygen or moisture. Such a seal must also be effective during transport of the filled containers and over a sufficiently long period of time to ensure that the food or beverage inside does not become contaminated by contacting oxygen or moisture. As a means of providing such a seal, it is known to apply a layer of polyethylene to the interior of the container, or to fill the interior of the container with a polyethylene foam. These seals are typically provided on the neck of the container as a lap joint or on the side of the container as a gusset, and the seals may have a variety of other names including overwrap, bellows, or shroud. By such a seal, however, the container cannot be used for the intended purpose of transporting fluids. A concern with containers that are sealed by overwrapping is that the seal is subject to tearing upon impact, for example during handling. An alternative type of seal known as a recloseable seal is provided by applying a label along the exterior of the container and then heat sealing the label to the container. Such a recloseable seal is disclosed, for example, in U.S. Pat. No. 5,154,397.
