A most promising technology for bioengineering tissues involves generating precursor cell populations in the lab that can be implanted in vivo and used to repair damaged or diseased tissues, as opposed to using cells that must be harvested from the donor patient. In prior work, human hematopoietic stem cells (HSCs) have been shown to be the cell of choice to harvest for bioengineered grafts, due in part to the ability of HSCs to form multi-lineage tissue-like structures when implanted in vivo.
