9. alternative mapping software. i mentioned a few alternatives. i have also had much more success using the open source maptools which i wrote and released. it is free to use and has some amazing functionality. i also like the mapbox api. anything is possible these days, and if anyone is interested in having a go, then drop me a line. installing arcgis is not that difficult for the pc user. the problem is with laptops. these systems are often used by the users who also deal with the loads of documents and data in various formats.

as their laptop is just a data repository, it becomes the bottleneck for them. so they end up with a pc and a laptop. that is the worst situation as the pc slows down the work of the laptop user. it is more of a matter of convenience. now laptops are quite fashionable these days. what is new in the store is the web mapping service and data interoperability. these are the features that arcgis is proud of and if you stay a corporate user you are forced to use the web mapping service. the price of this is that you are limited with the data you can work with. in the coming future, if you want to work with new data that has not been imported into your local instance of arcgis. you will have to upload the data to the web and get the web services client to work with it. while this may not be an issue for some people, for others it is a big problem. even for the desktop arcgis user, it makes some people think twice before they try to go to a different publisher in addition to what is written above, arcgis also has some really amazing tools that qgis can only dream of. things like the ability to recreate layer classification into multiple levels using a little intelligent code that can be extended to include any field, or the ability to create an object from a collection of points/lines. it also has advanced analysis tools that even commercial business softwares cant touch. and all this is packaged into a very easy to install and easy to use package. qgis is not even close to the level of functionality arcgis has achieved and it is free (for non-commercial use). this makes it a very difficult decision for a gis professional to go for.
