One of the main benefits of Cold Turkey is the way they target the whole application. For example, you can block YouTube and other Google applications while leaving search engines and the rest accessible. Another example is blocking Spotify while leaving Pandora accessible. Finally, if your worry is privacy, then you are not alone. Cold Turkey claims they don't store any information (which is what I do read in their privacy policy), and don't log IP addresses or other internet related information. But, there is that annoying prompt for your location. It comes with an option to choose the country or region you live in, or you can choose the USA, Australia, Canada, or Europe. I tried the latter and once a week I got the prompt anyway. This could be solved by either adding more countries to the option or letting the user choose a random country. This may or may not bother you, but I personally find it a bit annoying. It will also work at times when I am out of the country of my country of residence. After testing the application for a while, I can safely say that this is a very good web filter and the best application I know for the job. Once installed, you can start Cold Turkey sessions and they will run in the background. I really enjoy this application as it saves me from tabs, delays, and the websites my friends want me to read. When it comes to speed, it is noticeable that it is somewhat snappier when compared to other well known blockers out there. But, at the same time, I find it a bit quirky, and at times not able to block some sites. That is why I recommend a paid version, as their developers apparently understand that speed is not everything and that there are users with certain needs. If its speed that matters, then you can get it for free but, I am sure you won't find out until you tried it for yourself.
