But for those who have chronic pain, which can be related to illness, the use of massage can also be a way to take care of oneself and feel better. A recent study from the University of California Davis, Department of Psychology, and the California School of Professional Psychology, in San Francisco, found that people with chronic pain report that massage and touch provided them with a sense of comfort and helped them cope with their pain better. To participate in the study, the participants underwent a functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) scan that allowed researchers to measure changes in brain activity as they lay in a dimly lit room. The participant was then brought to a quiet room where the fMRI was performed a second time. Then the subject was handed a tissue box. They were then asked to rate how much they felt at ease, supported and cared for in the room before they were handed a tissue box. Afterward, they were again asked to rate how they felt. Those with chronic pain indicated that the room provided them with more support and comfort than those without pain. Even if pain relief isn't the purpose of the massage, it can still have a positive effect. Visit IRT for more information on massage and how it can help you. Q: How to remove
