Quantitative risk analysis of biomonitoring in biological monitoring programs. The current study aimed to investigate the benefits and barriers of using the OATP2B1 transcript level in the model organism Fusarium oxysporum to infer the human OATP2B1 drug-drug interaction potential and to evaluate the probability of an error when calculating a risk score to trigger a biomonitoring program (BMP). The model was generated using the metabolic transition rate equations (MTR), and their application to the available human and F. oxysporum in vivo data set was performed. The outcome is defined as the risk score, which is a combined estimate of the probability of error and the probability of a positive outcome. The risk score of 0.16 was defined as the threshold, which triggers an urgent biomonitoring program. A risk score of 0.15 was calculated, and the probability of an error was

A new type of alcohol oxidase from a filamentous fungus. Filamentous fungi have been suggested as a promising source of new enzymes due to their high biomass production and a wide range of ecological niches. In this study we report the purification and characterization of a new copper-containing alcohol oxidase from the filamentous fungus Glarea lozoyensis. We have named the enzyme as alcohol oxidase 1
