As smartphones have become more and more portable, they've transformed into amazing photography tools. The advent of the smartphone has brought the average photographer into a new world void of professional cameras and photography studios. We can still use some professional features such as the ability to zoom in and the ability to manually adjust white balance, but the average photographer can shoot and upload photos from mobile devices that are just as good in the majority of cases as the newest high-end DSLR machines that cost major amounts of money. Now on to my last gripe - the desktop. I agree with you that the desktop should be redone. In my opinion, however, rewriting the desktop is not a priority. The transition to the iOS-like layout was a big improvement over Lightroom, and I like having my presets in a centralized location. To get around bloat, I've also rolled my own version of the Lightroom 4 test disk . To my disappointment, there are a lot of slashes in Lightroom's new system, so if anyone with Linux wants to offer us a fix , we'd be all ears! The new rating scheme is both annoying and a bit confusing. The overall star rating does not seem to give any useful information - if it isn't at least a 5/5 rating, it's written off as "great, useful for very personal or non-commercial use". The rating is then multiplied by the proportion of the current rating, which is the most unhelpful rating system I've ever seen. The difference between star ratings is far more than is actually useful.

"Photoshop for the web", and for the first time ever, it is now possible to select, place and resize a selection based on raster data. In a single step, you can create a seamless background, edit shapes and text, add color using an intuitive color picker with 16.7 million color combinations, convert raster images to vector and more. To provide a solution to the fatigue that comes with constant design updates, Adobe has created a separate development environment for working on the web which focuses only on web trends and browser innovations. This new environment, known as the Webflow Environment, allows for more control and freedom. It also exposes a brand-new, full-featured three-tier, hybrid native app. The next step for Adobe on the web is further optimization which involves taking the existing expertise we have at Adobe and combining it with the work we're doing on the web. In that sense, Adobe is launching the Lit project, a new initiative aimed at making the photoshop experience available across Android devices. Lit is short for Lightweight Interoperability Layer. The project is in beta with the first release for Android planned for this spring. In the coming months, Adobe will expand/add support for the new release across both macOS and Windows. 933d7f57e6
