Nonlinear dynamics and chaos Solved for Homework 1.Q: Why does the compiler complain about a non-existent specialization if it exists? I was going through some code which started containing quite a bit of template meta-programming and wondered what compiler errors could be suppressed in such cases. static_assert(std::is_same::type, double >, "Coordinate type should be double"); So I decided to find out what is going on. So I went ahead and expanded and specialised the template double_clamp_func like this: template struct double_clamp_func { typedef T type; template static constexpr double clamp(const double_clamp_func& func) { return func.clamp(); } }; template struct double_clamp_func { typedef double type; template static constexpr double clamp(const double_clamp_func& func) { return func.clamp(); } }; Everything seemed fine - the error went away - so I went ahead and deleted the template double_clamp_func and the static_assert statement. Now I am getting this error: main.cpp: In instantiation of 'double_clamp_func::type': main.cpp:34:30: required from here main. f988f36e3a
