The present invention also relates to a method for producing such an element. Magnetoresistance effect elements used in the magnetic sensing element, the magnetic recording medium, and the thin-film magnetic head are characterized to have low resistance as well as high sensitivity. It is necessary for the elements to have high magnetic characteristics. Consequently, in order to obtain high magnetic characteristics, the element is formed on an insulating substrate made of Al2O3, MgO, Y2O3, AlN, ZnO, etc. and is heat-treated in a reducing atmosphere to form a nonmagnetic layer made of TiN, CoN, or the like. In the conventional element, however, the nonmagnetic layer made of the same oxide is very brittle and unstable, such as the growth of films from the substrate. As a result, it is not easy to provide an element having stable characteristics. In addition, since a very high temperature is required for the heat treatment, the conventional element can be applied only to the substrate made of insulating material having a high melting point. It is an object of the present invention to provide a magnetoresistance effect element having stable characteristics and having a high degree

You can now generate a shortcode that embeds a Press Release into any page. If you have a Press Release Template, you can add the code into your template. Press Releases are a great way to generate news and interest for your blog. When people find your Press Release, they won't just read the news, they'll read the source too. If you like a Press Release, you can share it on your blog too. Click "share" then "Embed press release". This is great news for bloggers and first-time site-owners. I'm not sure how I feel about it. Embedded images allow you to put a Press Release into a post, making it more visually attractive. But in that the Press Release is now part of the post, you lose the ability to review the Press Release as a standalone piece of content (imagine the power of the RSS feed when you can see the full article!). I'm sure that some bloggers will do this and enjoy it. As a first-time site-owner myself I think I'll probably stick with the standard Press Release method for now. But having the easy-copy paste option available will no doubt improve my technique. return n.documentation } }) // 79a2804d6b
