I switched back to Photoshop CS5, and I can keep my files in the old way until I convert everything to CS6. It was possible in CS5. CS6 needs a lot of modification. It's a pity that I won't be able to switch. A OS can allocate a display area to use as a framebuffer by setting up the appropriate parameters on that area (which allows it to be configured for use as a framebuffer). The screen area is used by the OS as a bitmap (which is why it is called a framebuffer). This is the most commonly used framebuffer type (and the one usually found default in recent OSes).
