If you have an earlier Lightroom version, all the PSD files can be loaded as well. After all, the purpose of Lightroom is to organize your images and in order to do that it has to know the basic file formats of the files they contain. If you don't have PSD files, you'll have to import them from another format. How can you import the file? I'll explain that in the next section - read on. In terms of features, you can crop, straighten and resize photographs, create composite images, adjust contrast, saturate colors and more, as well as remove objects, including people. Let's start with the ambition. When we made this thing y'all call Photoshop we wanted to change the creative process to make it easier to work. At Adobe we've been thinking about, building, shipping, iterating, and improving Photoshop for over 35 years. In this beta we're taking the first real step toward democratizing the design process across all sorts of things, and democratizing creativity across all sorts of things: be they phones, computers, or other creative tools. We created this version of Photoshop knowing that what would make Photoshop the best design tool possible wasn't about looking exactly like Photoshop in the traditional sense. Design tools in the past have always been, and should always be, works of art. They are extensions of the artist; they're extensions of us, and they are used as an artistic or aesthetic way to communicate. We wanted to make sure that the new Photoshop would be an extension of the creative process as well. I'd look at what I was creating, and I'd want to apply it to the next version of the project. At some point something's going to feed back into Photoshop. So, what we're trying to do for you in this part of the betas is bring you an experience that feels like Photoshop, but which contains all the key functions that Photoshop needs to run. This new user experience of Photoshop, we're calling Adobe Photoshop on the Web. We've also decided to experiment and explore at scale with a new way we call this service delivery. We don't have all this amazing content and great technology, we've been slowly building and accumulating that, and we also don't have a lot of bandwidth. The great thing in the open source community, and in the Google world, and in the startup world of the past few years is a new philosophy for how to deliver a great experience, and scale that great experience. We think that's the approach that will help us achieve and make best use of the capabilities we've been battling around to solve our problems and make Photoshop better. So, let's talk about what that looks like. In our modern world, we consume information and content from a wide range of devices. We like to have great products that can work on whatever device we have handy. So, we're not going to be porting Photoshop to the web. We're going to be working from web start to finish. We're going to make a modern web version with modern web capabilities. So, with these design tools we're also adding a high level of accessibility to Photoshop. We're not doing this by removing all the stuff that's in Photoshop today. A lot of people think they want it and want it all (to be included), especially by now, in 2020, you come busting in and you want it all. That's not what we're going for. We are stripping out and modernizing as much code as we can and encouraging you to compromise and make sure you can adjust your workflow on the web. I'd look at what I was creating, and I'd want to apply it to the next version of the project. At some point something's going to feed back into Photoshop. So, what we're trying to do for you in this part of the betas is bring you an experience that feels like Photoshop, but which contains all the key functions that Photoshop needs to run.
