Some of us might have a fancy, light-room-like photo management tool, and some of us might be fine with a standard folder hierarchy. Either way, we need to be able to make sure we can locate images, easily make backups, and be able to show our clients what's in their images. It sounds simple, but many people get tripped up along the way, especially with new and unfamiliar tools or workflows. In case you don't already know it, Adobe Ideas 20 is an amazing tool that's introduced to you on this page. It's a fully-featured Photoshop for web and mobile developers, and it incorporates Adobe's latest AI, object recognition, adaptive color, and real-time design and theming tools. Adobe says that you don't have to create your own design templates, but you can use Creative Cloud or in-demand design freelancers to help you with this aspect of the process. This is a huge time-saver. Adobe is trying to be everywhere for photographers, and it is attempting to cover a lot of ground here. Since the company is continuing the old Save for Web and Cloud ideas, I'm not sure how far the company plans to go with this, but it seems worth a look.
