I often use Photoshop for photo manipulations, sometimes to produce as output images from my lightroom catalog (pixelarizing). The workflow to create digital negatives (printing negative) with the help of Photoshop is without a doubt one of my favorite tools. You can see the difference compared to other RAW photo manipulation software like Lightroom. By using a piece of software like either Photoshop or Adobe Camera Raw, you can effectively produce a wide range of digital prints from standard to negative. In my eyes, you can only see the difference when working with both programs to print negative images. I am very impressed by the view, sharpness and color saturation of the crops I made. If you perform even minor adjustments with the tools in Photoshop, you can customize the prints even more, using a range of tools, such as light and shadow adjustment, painting layer (layer mask) to remove unwanted elements or replace with other colors, components of the original image crop or change saturation. Maybe this is the area where Photoshop excels the most: in creating a digital negative, by performance and the wealth of tools available for make a difference. When you have users involved, you get feedback in the form of the Adobe Touch tool.
