I hope they mean business with these features – they need to be great, not virtual. Some of the newer camera RAW systems are significantly better than Lightroom's. For example, I find the Nik Software version I use on my X-E1 is so much better than Lightroom's, I don't even have my old catalog. Lightroom offers a very quick and clean way to edit RAW files and with a lightly skilled photographer, Lightroom can be sufficient for most of their needs. But for a more experienced user, who wants to fine-tune their images, there is a little more to Photoshop, and benefits increase. Lightroom can process JPEG files within the RAW format. But JPEG images will never look as good as RAW files. Adobe Photoshop can process around 20 different RAW formats, some of which are camera manufacturer specific. When you import a RAW image into Photoshop, it is initially processed by 'auto' settings which gives you a good starting point. Then you can edit your image, the same way you would any other picture in Photoshop. Lightroom has over 10,000 images that you can use for color and tone comparisons. Most of the time, what you see with your eye is the result of color balance somewhere in between normal and overly yellow/red. What Is the Best Adobe Photoshop for Beginners?
