Text: Combo: Item 1 Item 2 The first Human Genome Project research report has been published by the National Human Genome Research Institute and was published in the journal Science in the US. This was the first large-scale effort to map the structure and function of the 3 billion pairs of chemical 'beads' that make up the human body and that are spread across every cell of the body. A total of 199 scientists from 72 institutions have been working on the project for several years. The report is part of the Human Genome Project, which began in 1990 in the US with its ultimate aim of decoding the entire human genome. The results of this research will undoubtedly lead to improvements in health care and will be applied in numerous areas of research from scientific discovery to disease prevention. The scale of the work is enormous. Each of our body cells contains 2.5 million DNA 'beads' and in order to find the exact position of each of them, all of the DNA in each cell would have to be analysed. The report states that 99.9%
