I'm Tom Lee and how I do this is that I pick an interest and then I follow that interest and try to start some kind of business. I've been interested in digital photography and film photography for 20 years and for a few years now I've been doing it professionally and in addition to that I've been reading, blogging, and writing for past 10 or so years. I've been interested in Photoshop since my elementary school years and now I'm 40 and I'm in my 13th year of Cinema5D. So I've been watching other people do what I try to do and I've learned a lot more, and slowly I've been working on my own current idea of little films and very little short videos that I try to produce using both FotoKem and Illustrator as my present skills are limited to the present. So I'm just taking a stab at this. But if you're more interested in the editing tools used to create the photo, the Adjustment layers in Photoshop get even more powerful. I've used Lightroom to get photos to a point where I need a second pass to finish the job, but I don't like to do that every time. Photoshop Correction layers enable you to straighten, blur, sharpen, brighten, darken, vignette, mattify, remove red eye, adjust color, add white or black borders, and refine. The workhorse of the new look is the Content Aware Fill tool. It's a new blend that integrates EXIF information into the image, and it replaces the previous Fill layer that required special masking. The tool automatically fills in areas of the image with similar content. It recognizes the type of image you're working on, the highlights and shadows in the image, and the color in the content. You can use the Fill and Adjustment layers to quickly and easily pop out the face, remove a background environment, add a box, and much, much more, and even experiment with a wide range of results. See the Upgraded To Photoshop CS6 feature for more details.
